Capt. Brown, Sergts. Lawler and Mackeller, with officers White, Schefflein, Misckeller and Morrell, have been busy since Saturday night in the endeavor to obtain a clue to the murderers, and have succeded in obtaining information of such a coaracter as to lead to the belief hat they will not escape the hands of justice.

The decessed, who appears to be a very fine looking man, occupied a room at No. 87 Chiver-st., New-York. The bouse is kept by an English family who appeared to know little about him, further than that he was one of their lodgers. He had been there but about two honths, and it is believed has not been in the country for a much longer period. His trunks were examined by the police, and all his effects taken possession of smong them the librates and scores of a number of operas, large bundles of letters, clothing, &a.

The theory of the manner of his death is that after peling invelled into the seculaded place where the crime ras committed, he was struck under the right car by me of the party with some blunt instrument, with the rains of the party with some blunt instrument, with the right of disabling him, and that not having the desired effect, another fired a pistol, from the effects of which he fell forward on his breast.
